The Atheist's Creation Problem

When an atheist speaks of man creating something, he is using the word "create" incorrectly. Man cannot create a grain of sand from nothing, let alone a living breathing entity. Try and think of any human being creating something material from nothing, and I don't mean creating a new breed of bacteria, by manipulating already-existing bacteria.

Man may manufacture, manipulate or maneuver, but he cannot create anything material—such as a rock, a leaf, a chicken, a tree, or even a flea, from nothing.

If we know that with all of his genius, man cannot create anything from nothing, how intellectually preposterous is it to actually believe that in the beginning nothing created everything? Atheism is off the charts of human foolishness. By contrast, the flat-earthier is a real genius. That's why an atheist has no scientific credibility, because his "nothing created everything" violates the basic laws of science.
